Dear sisters and brothers in Christ:

It is in solidarity with the 68.5 million displaced children, women, and men throughout the world that we invite you to embark on a journey of faith, love, and hope. “Hope is the force that drives us to ‘share the journey,’ because the journey is made jointly: by those who come to our land, and by us, who go towards their heart, to understand them, to understand their culture, their language,” stated Pope Francis during a general audience on September 27, 2017. He added that, “It is a joint journey by two parties; but without hope, that journey cannot be made. Hope is the drive to share the journey of life […].”

Through this journey, rooted in the inherent dignity of each human person, Pope Francis invites us to meet the other and to see the humanity of each migrant. In following the teachings of the Beatitudes, we should recall the message given to us in the Letter to the Hebrews (13:1–3): “Let mutual love continue. Do not neglect to show hospitality to strangers, for by doing that some have entertained angels without knowing it. Remember those who are in prison, as though you were in prison with them; those who are being tortured, as though you yourselves are being tortured.”

On May 3rd, during a panel at the United Nations, Cardinal Tagle, the president of Caritas Internationalis, also reminded us that we are challenging our own faith, and this gives us the opportunity to prove, through the support we offer to those who come to us, that we recognize Jesus in each of them. The meeting with the other is a great journey that starts inside of us and enables us to connect with our profound humanity, to undo stereotypes, and to combat prejudice, fear of the other, racism and xenophobia.

It is therefore in the name of Jesus Christ that I ask you to accept this invitation from the Church and to share the journey with Development and Peace – Caritas Canada, the official international solidarity organization of the Church in Canada. Do not hesitate to take part in the Share the Journey campaign by spreading the word in your community, actively participating in the actions proposed to you, raising funds for Development and Peace and supporting efforts made by your community to welcome migrants and refugees.

May the Lord bless your generosity and faithfulness.

Fraternally in Our Lord,
† Lionel Gendron, P.S.S.

“Before the challenges of contemporary movements of migration, the only reasonable response is one of solidarity and mercy.”
– Pope Francis, Homily, July 6, 2018
This Lent, let’s share the culture of encounter

Lent is a sacred period, a time of preparation, introspection, and transformation that offers us the opportunity to deepen and enrich our faith. It is also a privileged moment of encounter: with ourselves, our loved ones, our neighbours, our community, and with God.

At a time when division seems to be at the forefront, when fear blinds minds and the culture of indifference stifles hearts, let’s take advantage of this moment of encounter to share the journey with the 68.5 million children, women, and men who are displaced around the world.

It can sometimes be difficult to grasp the extent of the impact that forced migration has on the lives of those who face it. However, the simple fact of being interested in what our sisters and brothers are experiencing is already a step toward the other, a first step on the way to a true encounter.

“Faith is an encounter with Jesus, and we must do what Jesus does: encounter others.”
– Pope Francis, May 18, 2013.

In the following pages, we invite you to meet women and men like Qawthar who had to flee the war in Syria, Kelly who was forcibly displaced due to the armed conflict in Colombia, and many others whom we support through our partners. Each, in their own way, inspires us to be proud ambassadors of a culture of encounter. A culture that requires from each and every one of us a deep and true commitment to reach out to others, to stop and behold them, to listen to them, and to give a little of ourselves. Here we share their stories, struggles, and dreams. Listen to what they have to say and open your heart to them.

This Lent, we are all called to be fellow travellers with our sisters and brothers who have had to flee their homes. Let’s be united in the hope of a better world, one where all can live in peace and security. Let’s be the force that transforms words of hatred and fear into messages of love and compassion. Let’s be the voice that rallies hearts onto the path of solidarity and hope.

Building resilience against climate change

Climate change is one of the main drivers of forced migration in the world today. According to some estimates, water scarcity, crop failure and rising sea levels could cause up to 143 million people to be displaced by 2050.

Poor coastal communities in the city of Tacloban in the Philippines already know this oncoming reality all too well. In 2013, they experienced the wrath of Super Typhoon Haiyan, whose 300 km/hr winds created a storm surge that swept away entire communities. In total, 4 million people were displaced by the storm.

While some migrated to different regions, others were forced into tents or put together makeshift shelters with scrap materials. Communities were also confronted with new government regulations forbidding them to rebuild along the coast, where they make their living fishing. Stripped of their homes and their livelihoods, survivors of the typhoon held bleak hopes for the future.

Development and Peace and its local partners, Urban Poor Associates (UPA), NASSA-Caritas Philippines, the Archdiocese of Palo and the Congregation of the Holy Redeemer, were determined to break the cycle of poverty that made communities vulnerable in the first place. They formed a consortium and purchased a piece of land for the construction of a permanent resettlement site that would involve the full participation of communities in transforming the land into a new village.

The film After the Storm: Building the Pope Francis Village follows the inspirational journey of these communities as they are empowered to build a future where they no longer must live under the threat of having to flee their homes.
Never again! Massacre victims take a stand against impunity

In 1990, a peaceful community in Nigeria was the victim of the first recognized crime committed by a company in the oil industry. Development and Peace partner Social Action is working with members of this community in their struggle to hold the company legally accountable and for their story to never be forgotten.

On October 30, 1990, members of the community of Umuechem, located in the Niger Delta, organized a peaceful march in an effort to claim their share of profits generated by more than 30 years of oil exploitation on their lands. Community members were disillusioned with the unfulfilled promises of Shell Nigeria. Faced with poverty and the pollution of their territory, young people, women and men decided to call for justice. They had already tried, unsuccessfully, to establish a dialogue with the oil company.

In response to the community’s march, Shell Nigeria contacted police authorities and falsely reported that their oil facilities were being attacked. Members of an elite police combat unit were quickly sent to the site. More than 300 people were killed and 495 homes burnt down. The survivors faced unparalleled devastation.

“It’s rather unfortunate that the police got involved. We weren’t asking for much, just roads, electricity, and water,” says Amechi Raymond, president of the Umuechem Council of Elders. “We elders had the opportunity to go to school, but our children are not educated due to a lack of resources because we’ve been impoverished.”

Traumatized by the massacre, almost all the survivors fled to neighbouring communities and have never returned home.

Social Action: standing shoulder to shoulder with marginalized communities

In 2014, members of the community of Umuechem contacted Development and Peace’s partner Social Action, which is known for its work with Nigerian communities affected by oil exploitation. More than 20 years after the massacre, the community was ready to take the oil company in question to court to demand compensation.

To end the impunity that Shell Nigeria has been enjoying, the community is taking the company to court in the Netherlands, where their headquarters is located. Social Action is working with human rights lawyers to assemble the necessary evidence to file the petition in court in 2019. The community is hoping that their story will never be forgotten.
Faced with persecution and violence, hundreds of thousands of Rohingya have had no choice but to flee Burma, also known as Myanmar. Across the border, in neighbouring Bangladesh, our partner Caritas Bangladesh is working to preserve the dignity of these people who just want to live in peace.

Since August 25, 2017, more than 863,561 children, women, and men belonging to the Rohingya Muslim minority have fled Burma to escape violence and persecution perpetrated by the Burmese army. Most have found refuge in camps located in the region of Cox’s Bazar in Bangladesh.

“It took us four to five days to get here from Burma,” says Shominara, an 11-year-old Rohingya refugee. “We brought some snacks with us for the road, and that’s what we ate for several days. At night, we hid in the forest. We drank a bit of water when we were thirsty if we found some in the forest. We suffered a lot to get here.”

This massive influx of refugees has resulted in an unprecedented humanitarian crisis. The urgency of their flight and the sheer scale of their displacement have increased the vulnerability of thousands of Rohingya who must now cope with the difficult living conditions and daily stresses of refugee life.

To date, the situation in Burma remains alarming. The conditions which would allow a safe and dignified return of Rohingya refugees to Burma are still far from being met. In this context, ensuring their needs over the long term is a priority.

Shominara, 11, has been living for more than a year in the Kutupalong refugee camp in Bangladesh.

Caritas Bangladesh: going beyond the emergency

As soon as the refugee crisis began, our partner Caritas Bangladesh responded immediately by building emergency shelters, clean water stations, safe latrines and showers for women and girls, as well as distributing hygiene kits and educating refugees on remaining safe in the camps.

The conviction that refugees are more than just victims is at the heart of the humanitarian work accomplished by Caritas Bangladesh. Refugees are full participants in the organization’s activities and programs. This approach ensures that emergency relief provided on the ground meets the most pressing needs, while also addressing long-term challenges, such as the poverty and inequality that make refugees vulnerable to abuse and exploitation.

Building a culture of peace after 50 years of armed conflict

Colombia is still recovering from half a century of armed conflict that claimed more than 260,000 lives. With the support of Development and Peace partner the National Agrarian Coordination (NAC), women are reclaiming their rights, their land and their dignity.

After more than 50 years of armed conflict involving government forces, guerrillas, paramilitary groups and organized crime networks, Colombia signed a peace agreement in 2016. It looked like better days were ahead. But decades of instability and violence have left deep scars on this nation. Colombia today has more than 7.7 million internally displaced persons, one of the highest numbers in the world, and the implementation of the peace agreement is on shaky ground as the new government of Yvan Duque plans to review it.

Peasant, Indigenous and Afro-Colombian communities have been especially affected by years of conflict. Violence, assassinations, disappearances, forced displacements and land grabbing have had an impact on these groups.

“On the day I was born, my family had to flee because of clashes between the [guerilla group] FARC and the army,” says Kelly Bolano Soto, an internally displaced person. “Three years later, the conflict calmed down and we were able to return to our land. When I was five years old, we had to flee again. Believing that we were hiding guerrillas, the army gave us 12 hours to leave our homes, after which it would set the village on fire. Five hours later, they started to burn down our houses.”

Women have suffered many kinds of violence at the hands of armed groups and from members of their own communities. This violence has long been hidden or ignored. The lack of women’s economic, social and political rights is reflected in the marginalization of women when it comes to participating in the political and economic life of the country.

In 2014, the Inter-ethnic Political Training School for peasant, Afro-Colombian and Indigenous women was established. There, women can learn the necessary skills to engage in credible dialogue with government authorities. By introducing women to the methods they need to reclaim their rights, their territory and their dignity, NAC is fostering an inclusive, participatory and democratic society.

Striving for peace after fleeing war

Since the start of the civil war in Syria in 2011, 12.5 million Syrians have been forced to flee. Our partner House of Peace (HOPe) works with refugees and host communities in neighbouring Lebanon, building bridges of peace between them.

“When I fled Syria, it was very difficult. I arrived in Lebanon as a refugee, and it was even harder to be perceived as an immigrant asking for aid,” says Qawthar, a Syrian refugee in Lebanon’s Bekaa Valley.

Qawthar’s experience is like that of many refugees who after having endured war, hunger and poverty in their homeland, find the courage to leave, but then face new struggles in their host country. In fact, 85% of the world’s refugees are being hosted by the poorest countries on the planet, and the arrival of refugees can create tensions over the sharing of already scarce resources.

This is particularly true in Lebanon, which is currently hosting 1.5 million Syrian refugees, almost one third of the Lebanese population. The country, which is still healing from a divisive civil war that ended in 1990, faces its own challenges, such as a fragile democracy, a high unemployment rate amongst youth and strained public services.

HOPe: building bridges between communities

Thankfully, Qawthar discovered HOPe, a Development and Peace partner that is fostering social peace between diverse communities. HOPe organizes 3-day workshops that bring participants on a journey, where by the end they are equipped with tools to manage conflict and have gained new perspectives on peace.

“When I first arrived, I was just a refugee, I felt weak. But then I took part in workshops and I gained knowledge and skills. My perception changed, and I discovered that nothing is impossible,” says Qawthar, who adds, “I want to have a positive impact on society and not just be labelled as a Syrian refugee.”

Once individuals have gone through the social peace workshop with HOPe, they are invited to develop an initiative that will promote peace and social cohesion. This can range from building a community space in a refugee camp to baking bread and distributing it to neighbours to give thanks for their hospitality.

Of course, HOPe wishes that participants will continue to spread peace wherever they may go so that in the future, no one is forced to flee their home due to conflict.

In some parts of the Middle East, the tradition of serving bread and salt is a way to create an alliance between two people.

One group of Syrian refugees decided to share this tradition with their Lebanese neighbours after participating in a House of Peace workshop. The women rose at 5 a.m. to bake bread and then went door-to-door to give this gift of gratitude to their host community. “This is a truly beautiful initiative. It brings people closer together,” says Hamda. “Is there anything more beautiful than peace? Peace brings people together, it erases differences, it’s love between people.”
